AN IMPERIAL SCANDAL.

A matrimonial scandal is now agitating the royal circles of Europe, and, although desperate efforts have been made to hush up the affair, it is quite certain that a married princess, the sister of an empress, and at one time destined herself to wear the royal crown, has eloped, and is now believed to be in this country. This princess is no other than the Duchess Sophia of Alencon, youngest sister of the Empress Elizabeth of Austria, and wife of the Duke of Alencon suddenly 1869. She was then a great beauty, like her five elder sisters, one of whom is the charming ex Queen Mary of Naples; but, unlike her sisters, her reputation, notwithstanding her youthfulness, was by no means untarnished, and it was a matter of surprise that the Orleans family should have admitted into its bosom a princess whom the King of Bavaria, Louis the Second, had indignantly repudiated, after his wedding day with her had already been appointed. Louis became engaged to the Princess Sophia, the youngest daughter of his uncle, the Duke of Bavaria, in 1867. She was then but sixteen. The prospect of wearing so soon a royal crown seemed to infatuate her. She rode about the country as if she were already queen, and asked all betrothed couples whom she met on her perambulations to postpone their wedding until the day of her own nuptials. With lavish hands she distributed photographs of her pretty person. These were made by Hausstengel, of Munich. Hausstengel was an exceedingly handsome man; he had traveled all over the world, and was a most fascinating conversationalist. The nephew of the frequent interviews between him and the young princess was that she fell in love with him, and it is said, that he frequently in Munich in the disguise of a servant girl. Their intimacy increased to such a degree that the princess prevailed upon her father to sell Hausstengel a small villa called the Fisherman's Castle, at a great distance from his own place at Possenhofen, so that during the summer of 1868 Hausstengel could be near her. Under the pretext of having more photographs of herself, the princess visited Hausstengel daily at his new villa, and hardly ever returned before a very late hour. It is true she was always accompanied by her brother, but the latter, who has since become a confirmed drunkard, was regularly given so much wine by the photographer that he always came home in a disgusting condition of intoxication.

Meanwhile people had commenced talking about the liaison, and caricatures had appeared in Munich. Louis, however, did not hear of the scandal. He loved his pretty cousin, and finally ordered that preparations for the wedding should be made. The day was fixed, when a gossiping lady at the Court of Munich said one day to the king's adjutant Count Holstein.

"Would it not be better if the Princess Sophia were admonished to be a little more circumspect in her love affair with Edward Hausstengel?"

Count Holstein not daring to speak of it to the king himself, told his brother Otto, who, in turn informed his mother, the Queen Dowager. The latter became excited, and, although the hour was past midnight, she drove to the palace of Sophia's father and informed the latter that the match between her son and his daughter was broken off, and that the princess must leave Bavaria. King Louis, upon hearing how his fiancé had been cutting up, was no less indignant. Hausstengel was also asked to leave Munich, but he defied the court. The rupture between the King and the Princess created a profound sensation throughout Bavaria, and, imperfectly as the facts were known, many thought the King had jilted Sophia without cause. On the other hand, rumors were current that her relatives treated her with ill-disguised aversion. She went with a deuce to London, and there the Duke of Alencon, an Orleans prince, fell in love with her. They were married shortly afterwards, but their wedded life became very unhappy, owing to the new facts which came to the ears of the husband about his wife's antecedents, on one side, and owing to Sophia's still continuing to be infatuated in regard to her photographing lover. Hausstengel frequently visited England, and is said to have met her on those occasions. The scandal became so great that the other members of the Orleans family would not allow the Princess Sophia to accompany them in 1871 to France, and her husband almost kept her as a prisoner the last few years. About three months ago Hausstengel came again to England, and notwithstanding the Duke's vigilance had repeated interviews with the Duchess. Early in December the two lovers disappeared from England, to the great chagrin of their families, and they could not be traced to any part of the continent. Hausstengel has not since returned to Munich, and the general belief is that he and the Duchess of Alencon have fled to the United States. The Duchess is still a very charming, graceful woman. She speaks half a dozen languages fluently, and may be readily mistaken for a French lady. She is tall and slender, and her manners are most engaging. The distress of the Empress of Austria, because of Sophia's misconduct, is said to be very great.

DRUGS AND CHEMICALS.

SIMMONS' TAKE LIVER REGULATOR

The Symptoms of Liver Complaint are uneasiness and pain in the side. Sometimes the pain is in the shoulder, and is mistaken for rheumatism. The stomach is affected with loss of appetite, sometimes sickness, bowels in general costive, sometimes alternating with lax. The head is troubled with pain, and dull, heavy sensation, considerable loss of memory, accompanied with painful sensation of having left undone something which ought to have been done. Often complaining of weakness, debility, and low spirits. Sometimes many of the above symptoms attend the disease, and at other times very few of them; but the Liver is generally the organ most involved.

THE FAVORITE HOME REMEDY.
